As we end the fall semester and begin looking forward to spring, let’s take some time to reset our courses and refresh ourselves. This issue of the Inspired Teaching Newsletter features some ways to renew our mindsets and materials.

Strategy of the Month

It may sound contradictory, but one of the best strategies for performing at our best is to take breaks from task and work responsibilities for a little while. These breaks can range from taking 5-minute microbreaks as we transition from one activity to another, to setting a project down for a few days so we can look at it with fresh eyes. Here are additional articles that reinforce the refreshing effects of taking a break:

Prioritize Self-care

As you juggle the many responsibilities you have, both personal and professional, reflect on the impact of reserving 30 minutes of your day, at least twice a week, to do something that is important for your well-being. If you find yourself saying, “I can’t neglect _____,” or “There’s no time for me to do something silly like ____,” no matter how much I enjoy it,” consider identifying items that are “plastic,” “glass,” or “ghosts” – which ones you can afford to drop, which ones you can’t, and which ones don’t need worrying about.

For example, set boundaries by establishing specific times during your week for teaching-adjacent responsibilities like office hours, consultations, grading assignments and providing feedback.

Helpful Tip

Refresh Your Course Materials

Revising and releasing new editions of our content every year seems like a daunting task; however, there is guidance!

Streamline Resources

As innovative discoveries occur in our respective fields, we add new resources to the ever-expanding list of course materials for students to use in their studies. However, we don’t purge these lists of resources that are no longer as relevant or current as often as we should. Eliminate excess resources which may make finding required course content cumbersome.
Use Student Comments as a Resource

While you explore new ways to refresh your course content, reread feedback from midterm and final GatorEvals student evaluations to identify where there may be gaps in resources to help them master course objectives. See which activities and materials resonated the least with students and which assignments may have been confusing. Use this data to decide if it’s prudent to retire an activity that takes a lot of your time to facilitate but doesn’t provide an equivalent result in student learning.

Pay Special Attention to Your Syllabus

In the hustle and bustle of updating course materials, it's easy to change the date on the syllabus and follow the same instructional plan from semester to semester. This practice can save time in a pinch, but in the long run it allows room for our syllabi to become stale and outdated. Take a critical eye to your course syllabi to find and replace language and resources that are no longer useful to students. Update activity due dates that are not consistent or in sync with the upcoming academic calendar then invite a colleague or a student (who has taken your course in the past) to read the syllabus for clarity and understanding. Additionally, check the UF Syllabus website for updated policies and links to resources for your students.

Occupational Safety & Risk Management Offers Workspace Ergonomic Evaluations

The Office of Occupational Safety & Risk Management offers Ergonomics services to UF employees, students, and guests. Ergonomics seeks to reduce physical stress on the body and reduce or even eliminate work-related musculoskeletal disorders (MSDs) by adapting workstations to fit individuals.

In this video Todd Morrone, Associate Director of Risk Management Services, shares how you can apply ergonomic principles at your workstation by integrating neutral posture, fit, and task rotation (movement) into your daily work process to prevent discomfort and injury. If you believe you experience discomfort at work due to the way your workstation is configured, you can request an evaluation.
